This book is helpful for human interaction in general. Whether parenting, sitting at a bar, meeting in social clubs, working with customers, employees or employers the perspectives in this book can be helpful. I have outlined a review of every chapter in the book and what is covered. Chapter 1 explains why coaching is difficult. Talks about the worst in parents, coach's self-portrait, conflict of interest and hang-ups. Describes inappropriate role models and commitment frustrations. Chapter 2 presents the idea of watching for teachable moments. Describes how to keep track of positive developments for each team member and communicating observations. Describes how to deliver constructive criticism during teachable moments with a track record of positive developments. Endores a high ratio of positive comments to few constructive criticisms. Chapter 3 shows ways in using teachable moments to maximize benefits. Encourages use of inspirational stories, metaphors, vision and using emotion to motivate. Chapter 4 discusses engaging the minds of team members during teachable moments. Helping team members to think for themselves, having team members coach each other and setting nurturing goals. Chapter 5 describes a coach's role in building self-esteem. Relates self-esteem to performance, competence, self-worth and self-endorsement. Chapter 6 talks about character building. Describes what the coach's most important character trait is. Gives an overview about positive character traits to be reinforced.
